In deed, as Goma notes the task of searching for ways out of this predicament is an urgent one for sub-Saharan African universities. The quality crisis may prove difficult to address, given that the economic and political environments in which these universities operate have not been particularly favourable (Mwiria, 1992).

These problems, therefore, call for the need to scientifically evaluate and measure the quality (performance) of a higher educational institution, based on acceptable assessment criteria.

2.3 Terminology for the Process of Evaluation

Many terms have been used to denote the process of assessing the outcomes of institutions in relation to goals and the resources employed to achieve them including accountability, evaluation, auditing, inspection and monitoring. Castel, Patal and Verspoor (1993) identified two areas by which higher educational institutions could be assessed. The first is the evaluation of higher education institution's academic quality to assess the calibre of instruction, research and student achievement, usually done by academic peers. The second evaluation for accountability, is to assess higher education institution's teaching and research programmes in terms of costs and benefits, usually carried out by funding agencies.

Castel et al continue to assert that for evaluation to be effective, they must not focus solely on results, outcomes, outputs or impacts. They must consider inputs, the reason why certain outcomes occur, and how to improve future performance. They identify three situations which can possibly result in confusion over terminology. These are environments:

- of uncertainty about how funds are spent and the quality of results achieved.
